7. When it comes to picking a place to stay in, there are multiple reasons for someone to prefer ~~choose~~ living in one environment or the other. Choosing to live in the city rather than the countryside is completely fair, as there are multiple benefits to such a lifestyle. For example, ~~a city~~ being located in a city means having easy access to vitals like food and clothes. Also, heat and water are problems solvable with money. ~~All in all,~~

8. In front of me is a pie chart, and I would like to describe and analyze it based on its content in order to ~~draw~~ ~~a conclusion~~ put forward a hypothesis as to why it is the way it is. In the diagram various teenagers' daily activities are shown along with percentage counts showing how big of a much time the average teenager spends doing said activity. And just by glancing over them, I can already say they don't look pretty. The biggest number on the list goes to sleeping, which takes up a measly thirty-percent. Despite it sounding like an unreasonably small number percentage, I actually think it's the perfect healthy limit. Another activity that is vital is eating with its fifteen-percent. If we add up the productive activities from here we can get a ratio of productive to unproductive activities, and that'll be twenty-five divided by thirty. The technological rise is what creates these activities, and so far I'm unbothered.
