The first reason she could give could be the quiet life in the countryside. Maybe she needs something like huss and bass which can be found in the city or a town. The second reason she could give could be the absence of big shopping centres or something like this. Last but not least, the third reason could be the lack of varied communication. It's true that people can suffer from a lack of communication.

A diagram which is given contains the information about daily activities for teenagers. The most popular one is sleeping, which takes 30 percent of the whole pie chart. The less popular are four of the activities given - sports, phone or texting, being online, videogames. They all take 10 percent of the whole diagram. Studying or doing homework and eating are at the second place and take only 15 percent of the whole range of activities.

The possible reason of the increasing amount of teenagers spending their time on sleeping could simply be understood.

because nowadays most of modern teens all over the world have to do a lot of tasks every day - help their parents or relatives, attend school, attain knowledge and after this do their homework and prepare for exams. All in all, I think the results are obvious.
