Task 7.

There are several reasons to hate living in a big city. One of them is definitely the noise. It seems like the city is never asleep. The other ones are pollution and prices that are overly increased in comparison to smaller cities. Another reason might be the fact that life is always too fast-paced in bigger cities. People are always in a hurry, they never get enough time to relax and care for themselves.

Task 8.

Nowadays people tend to think that today's teens almost live in their phones. But even though seventy three percent of them are on social networks, teens still have a life outside their phones.

For example, only thirty seven percent of teenagers text their friends daily, which is most likely because they meet them in person. There still is a negative side of ~~social~~ teenagers' social media usage. Twenty five percent of Facebook users are under the age of ten. One more scary fact is that an average teen has 201 Facebook friends. But what usually happens is that they don't text more than a half of them. Besides, only eight percent of American teens use Twitter.

That little percentage of being interested in Internet more than reality shows that teens have their own life again. In a few years the numbers might drop even lower and the teenagers' lives will become independant from any social media.
