First, Oliver thought it was the long-awaited promotion letter. If only working honestly and only getting sick once in a blue moon was enough for a manager's position, where he would be in his element! Yet, it was not to come. Even worse, this month's pay had been cut was the final straw. Oliver resolved to give the ^{ring} strange message a red d.

The next morning, he witnessed an unusual sight - the whole office was gathered around the in-stand. They have actually been standing around it long before he came in. The posted paper said their department, by and large, was not only a pathetic rudiment, but stood in the way of progress. So, Oliver was out of work. How will he make ends meet if not for his job?

6. He had a choice now- either take advantage of the situation or stay reluctant and live on the breadline. Can he ever revive the initiative he now regrets hiding for all these years? "I am not ~~going to~~ listening to the push folk at the unemployment center!" With that, the once office plankton entered a life of newfound resolve, a great job and countless exciting prospects.
